Saudis Say Pact Is 'Unacceptable'

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia, Sept. 19 - Saudi Arabia today rejected the outcome of the Camp David sum-mit. A Saudi statement termed the summit agreements an "unacceptable formula for a definitive peace." At the same time, Jordan said that it would not be bound by any accord which it had not negotiated.

In Lebanon, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat declared that President Carter would "pay for" the Egyptian-Israeli agreements, Mr. Arafat's Palestine Liberation Organization, denouncing them as "the most dangerous' accords since the creation of Israel' 30 years ago, called for a general strike tomorrow by Palestinians everywhere in the Middle East, including Israel.

The Saudi statement, issued here after a special Cabinet meeting chaired by King Khaled, said that the Camp David formula was unacceptable because "it did not make absolutely clear Israel's intention to it occupies, including Jerusalem."

The statement said that the Camp David agreements also failed to record "the right of the Palestini-an people to self-determination and to set up their own state in their homeland and on their own soil,"

It added that the accords "ignored the role of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which Arab summit conferences have recognized as the sole legitimate repre-sentative of the Palesinians."

The Saudi statement praised President Carter for his peace efforts. But it said that Saudi Arabia could not accept formulas that "contradict higher Arab interests."
It termed the present stage critical, and called for a joint Arab stand.

The personal involvement of King Khaled in the discussion was unexpected. Saudi backing was widely considered to be crucial for the success of the agreements. Kuwairi Emir Sheikh Jaber al

Ahmed as Sabah also presided over n special Cabinet session today to review the summit. Jordan criticized the Egyptian-fs-raeli agreements in a statement issued in Amman tonight after a three-bour Cabinet meeting, with King Hussein presiding. The statement said that Jordan would not be bound by agreements that it had not belped to negotiate. The statement excluded any "le-

Egypt's Kamel to Return To Ambassadorial Duties

Mohammed Ibrahim Kamel, who quit as Egypt's foreign minister during the Camp David summit meeting, will continue to work for the Egyptian government. Cairo's official Middle East News Agency reported yesterday.

Quoting President Anwar Sadat, the agency said that Mr. Kamel would take a job as an ambassador in the Egyptian Foreign Ministry.

Mr. Kamel reportedly resigned because he disagreed with concessions that Mr. Sadat made at Camp David. The agency quoted Mr. Sa-dat as saying that Mr. Kamel "visited me...and asked to return to the Foreign Ministry as an ambas-sador and I accepted."

Mr. Kamel, a longtime friend of Mr. Sadat, was appointed to the Cabinet on the eve of the Egyptian leader's Christmas summit meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin. He replaced Ismail Fahrny, who resigned in protest over Mr. Sadat's trip to Jerusalem last November.

Mr. Kamel, a career diplomat, was ambassador to West Germany when Mr. Sadat named him foreign minister. Mr. Sadat said in an ABC News interview that he had accepted the resignation as of Friday.

Amnon Rubenstein, a leader of the splinter Shai faction of the DMC, said the Shai party would support the government. The five members of the Agudat Israel Party and two Liberal Party members reportedly decided last night to support Mr. Begin.

Coupled with at least a share of the 12 votes in the divided National Religious Party and possibly 15 of the 20 votes in Mr. Begin's own Herut Party, the left and centrist support would give the settlement issue the majority needed for adop-tion, according to most reliable Knesset headcounts available.

A straw poll of Knesset members last night by reporters for Israel's state-owned television showed that of the 68 members contacted, 42 favored giving up the settlements, two were against and 24 said they would not reply to the poll.

But we must also not forget the magnitude of the obstacles that still remain . . . I have already invited the other leaders of the Arab world to help sustain progress toward a comprehensive peace.

We must also join in an effort to bring to an end the conflict and terrible suffering in Lebanon.

Carter's Political Image Transformed Overnight

By David S. Broder

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 (WP) The political world redrew its portrait of Jimmy Carter yesterday — in bold and winning colors.

From the volunteered comment of 1980 Republican bopeful John consulty that the president "is en-titled to very high marks" for a Middle East summit that "exceed-ed my fondest expectations," to the joking comment by an aide to Ed-ward Kennedy that the Massachusetts senator may cancel his plans 10 address the New Hampshire Democratic convention next week, there was universal acknowledge ment that the Camp David diplomatic achievement would be a ton-ic to Mr. Carter's sagging political

By every politician's yardstick the president was a larger, more commanding figure oo the world stage, with Congress and with his iomestic constituents yesterday than he had been 24 hours before. The only question mark - and it was a large one — was how big and how long-lasting the lift will prove

Inside the White House, the Camp David summit was being de-icibed as vindication of the president's often-criticized penchant for seeking "comprehensive" solutions seeking had a lead a problem.

Turning Point Seen

pletes the me "People suddenly see a turning point for the president," one of his sides commented, "because the Middle East negotiations, the natural-gas bill and civil-service reform are all coming as way this is really a period of fruition.

"It's just like the 1976 campaire of eff are all coming his way at once. But "It's just like the 1976 campaign

Along with such abstractions, there was hope in the Carter circle that Sunday night's dramatic an-nouncement of Israeli-Egyptian agreement of a framework for peace might signal a return of the "Carter luck" that characterized his 1976 campaign — and almost ooth-

Rep. John Brademas, D-Ind., the House majority whip, said: "You could feel the difference on the floor. The president was stronger today than 24 bours ago."

Others, however, cautioned that serious problems remain for Mr. Carter oo the legislative front. Rep. John Anderson, R-Ill., said that "despite all the hallclujahs and pacans of praise being sung. I don't think the public works veto is going to be affected."

There seemed more likelihood to politicians that Mr. Carter's 1980 fortunes would be boosted. Sen. Kennedy, who has been leading Mr. Carter in the polls as the pre-ferred 1980 Democratic presiden-tial candidate, quickly issued a statement praising the president for bringing "renewed hope for a last-ing peace."

There was considerable doubt expressed by Republicans that the turnabout in Mr. Carter's fortunes will have a major bearing on the midterm elections seven weeks from today. Republican National Chairman Bill Brock, who said Mr. Carter "deserves credit for a job well done," also noted that "the president really wasn't cutting too much against congressional Demo-crats and we don't think his success on a foreign policy issue will cut to much for them."

Rep. Guy Vander Jagt, R-Mich, chairman of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee, said: "Every Democrat around was trying to put distance between himself and Carter, and most of them were doing it successfully." Republican polister Robert Teeter said flatly: "At this point, Carter is a almost irrelevant to this year's election, and I doubt Camp Desid will tion, and I doubt Camp David will change that."

'Different Man'

Earlier yesterday, Mr. Azcue said be believed that a man who identi-fied himself as Lee Harvey Oswald and angrily demanded a visa for Cuba in 1963 was not the same man named later as John F. Kennedv's assassin.

But Mr. Azcue, now retired, told the committee that he could be convinced that he was wrong by scientific evidence. Committee sources said that such evidence was forthcoming.

Mr. Azoue, testifying through a translator, told the committee that the Oswald who came to the consulate in Mexico City was a "cold, hard" man, thinner than Mr. Kennedy's alleged assassin.

He said that the man demanded an immediate visa for entry to Cuba and that be became unpleasant when told it would require pri-or approval from Havana. Azcue's recollections have caused speculation that a second man might have posed as Oswald in an elaborate conspiracy scheme. "Fifteen years have gone by, so it is very difficult for me to guarantee it in a categorical sense." Mr. Azcue said, "but my belief is that this gentleman was not is not the person who went to the consulate. "I had a clear picture because we had had an unpleasant discussion," be said. would change his mind.

"Under such circumstances I would have to accept that I was seeing visions," he replied.

Mrs. Sylvia Tirado Bazan, the Cuban secretary who dealt with Oswald at the consulate, insisted that he is the same man named by the Warren Commission, according to a transcript of testimony released by the committee.

She said that she recognized Oswald's picture in newspapers af-ter Mr. Kennedy was assassinated in Dallas on Nov. 22, 1963.

The Conference and Carter

Camp David has such implications for the Middle East and for the world that it is almost denigrating to consider its implications for President Carter. Yet Jimmy Carter, as a person, as a president, as a party leader has his own significance for his times - and the Begin-Sadat meeting has importance for him.

To be sure, the results of the Camp David sessions, on any permanent hasis, are not yet known. Whether the frameworks for peace created there will serve their purposes or even survive is by no means certain now. But to have negotiated with the president of Egypt and the prime minister of Israel, after they had apparently dug themselves into a stalmated position and to have emerged with the documents, and the atmopshere of good will, that topped off the Camp David fortnight was in itself a triumph for Mr. Carter, and one that was reflected in the words and applause of the members of Congress in the wake of the announcements from the White House, and the address to the joint congressional session.

Mr. Carter seemed to have reached his own stalemate when he invited the leaders of Israel and Egypt to the Maryland retreat. His popularity with the people at large was low; his ability to get his program through Congress was doubted. And this in spite of the fact that he had succeeded in getting senatorial approval for the controversial Panama Canal Treaty. With all the Western world clamoring for the United States to adopt an energy policy that would shore up the dollar and with such complex matters as taxes and civil service reform up for debate, the apparent inability of Mr. Carter to dent his opposition, whether Democratic or Republican, raised much speculation as to his political future and the economic prospects for his

It cannot be taken for granted that the success at Camp David, even if it carries on to major solutions in the Middle East, will affect Congress or the U.S. voter too profoundly. Republicans have pointed out, with a good deal of truth, that most Americans are more concerned over inflating costs at home than deflating perils in the Middle East. Events there are certain to affect energy policies (although just how remains to be seen) but states that produce natural gas want higher pay for it, while the consuming states want to pay less. The United States is at present in a mood of doubt about foreign commitments; there is a trend toward isolationism, more Americans are concerned over the potential of California's Proposition 13 than that of UN Resolution 242. So a success in foreign affairs will not necessarily give the president much clout in dealing with matters of purely domestic concern.

But in any event, Mr. Carter has given a striking display of ability in a very difficult situation, and quite apart from the direct effects of this statesmanship, it should create a greater aura of respect for the man from Georgia in places where it will count for his administration.

Thus the Camp David venture, a gallant one, courageously and intelligently carried through, may well have an impact beyond the area with which it was directly concerned. Public opinion can be very changeable, and events in today's uncertain world seldom lead to the kind of broad simplicities that confronted one another in the 1930s or 1940s. But an episode of this kind, coming in a period when lines are forming, could be critical for President Carter and his policies. And if he gains from Camp David, he will deserve his winnings.

International Opinion

Views of Mideast Summit

President Carter will now reap the benefits of extracting a great diplomatic victory from the jaws of looming defeat. It is a real achievement. He ran great risks in staging the Camp David summit. His gamble has paid off. It showed courage, and a dogged refusal to accept defeat. A new impetus has been given to the peace initiative started by Sadat's visit to Jerusalem last November, which has seemed to be in its death throes. That in itself is a great gain. Secondly, Camp David has brought much nearer — though not yet within grasp — the possibility of a peace treaty and establishment of normal relations hetween Israel and Egypt. If that particular ship can be brought safely to harbor, it could transform prospects for the area. The old dreams of Egyptian manpower and land allied to Israeli skills would open up. There are formidable rocks to be steered around.

The nearest one is the Knesset vote on the Sinai settlements. More serious may be Soviet, Syrian and PLO efforts to undermine Sadat. This is where the greatest danger to the Camp David accords lies. The position taken up by Saudi Arabia and by King Hussein of Jordan will be of very great importance. Neither will want to worsen Arab disunity. Both are so strongly opposed to the spread of Soviet influence that they will surely besitate long hefore opposing the plans. The man to whom most credit is due is President Sadat, He has traveled the farthest. He deserves the utmost support.

- From the Daily Telegraph (London)..

At first sight, it looks as though Menachem Begin, the Israeli prime minister, has pulled off a remarkable coup. The prospect of a hilateral peace treaty with Egypt lies virtually within his grasp, if the outstanding issue of the settlements in the Sinai can be resolved to the satisfaction of the Knesset and the Egyptian government. Yet the accompanying framework agreement which is being offered as the starting point for a wider Middle East peace settlement, simply skirts around most if not all of the long-familiar stumbling blocks, or fails even to mention such central issues as the future of Jerusalem, the future of the Golan Heights, or the role of the Palestine Liberation Organization. It is possible that President Carter and President Sadat received assurances -- or at least indications - that Mr. Begin would be prepared to make more concessions in practice than he could afford to commit to paper right now. Indeed, it is only on some such assumption that one can take seriously the euphoria expressed by President Carter.

The most serious risk is that the Camp David agreements could precipitate another vicious spiral of violence and counter-violence. The PLO has made it clear that it will do anything it can to torpedo the Begin-Sadat agreements, and that could include a new wave of terror. At the extreme, there is the danger that the PLO could put a match to the Lebanese tinder-box, with incalculable consequences for Israel and for Syria. There is a long way to go before we shall be in sight of peace in the Middle East.

- From the Financial Times (London)..

Mr. Carter placed himself in the line of fire as no other American president has done before, and 13 days later - it took that long - had the two marksmen embracing in his presence. Whatever proves to be the substance of the agreements they signed, and there must still be large reservations about that, Mr. Carter emerges from Camp David with the reputation not only of a trier but of a doer, which he sadly needed to prove. His purpose was to gain an agreement between Mr. Sadat and Mr. Begin, and that has been achieved. It is not the same thing as resolving the Middle East conflict, which as Mr. Carter said is not going to be resolved overnight (or, it is realistic to say, in his lifetime).

Both the old enemies have to sell the agreements to their constituents. Mr. Begin has problems but Mr. Sadat's are incomparably larger. In Syria, Libya of course, and within the Palestine Libberation Organization, the Egyptian president was already being tarred with the reliable old brush of treachery. He may well be able to deliver the Egyptian people. But no one, and certainly not Mr. Sadat, can deliver the Arab world. Without Egypt's huge hargaining power on the Arab side, the other Arab states may be left in that most dangerous of conditions — which is impotent rage. The cure of that condition will test even Mr. Carter's new-found diplomatic resource, and his strongest argument over the months will be that Israel has shown and continues to show good faith. Is Israel ready and willing to give him that argument? The answer could decide between war and peace. - From the Guardian (London)..

Even if these prospects do oot materialize, the standing of this country and its president have been enhanced in ways beneficial to U.S. interests around the world. So President Carter put it mildly when he said that his Camp David meeting with President Sadar and Prime Minister Begin yielded "substantial results."

The heart of what happened is the Egyptian-Israeli accord. It traces a path toward settlement in remarkable detail - peace treaty by Dec. 17; withdrawal of Israeli troops from the whole Sinai Desert including three military airfields and excepting only a few security zones; at the end of the withdrawal, which would last up to three years, normalization of relations including the exchange of ambassadors.

Reservation

To be sure, there is a reservation that Israel first close down Jewish settlements in the Sinai Desert. Prime Minister Begin is to put that up to the Knesset in the next two weeks. Bot it strains credulity to believe that the Knesset will refuse agreement. For the settlements are now the only stumbling block be-tween Israel and a peace with Egypt first, if not a separate peace.

The agreement on the West Bank main Arab parties to the dispute the Palestinians and the Jordanians -were oot at Camp David. Still there is a remarkable amount of detail. The framework agreement provides for a five-year transition period; dismantling of the Israeli military government; formation of an autonomous regime by local Palestinians: maintenance of international security by forces of Israel, Jordan and the United Nations; maintenance of ultimate security by forces of Isra-el Jordan and the United Nations; and negotiations for eventual sovereignty over the area in which the Palestinians would participate through elected representatives.

In reaching those agreements concessions were made by both sides. Sadat has yielded on his demand that Israel agree in advance to withdraw from "every incb" of occupied Arab land, Except for a small security presence, Begin has abandoned the Israeli claim to anything on the West Bnak and in the

Sadat, ever since his trip to Jerusalem last fall, has been asking for the United States to enter the negotiations as a "full partner." He twice broke off promising negotia-tions with Israel to force the U.S. intervention which was achieved at Camp David. Having achieved what be called the "presence of the American nation in the negotiating process" be could make concessions because he was in position to tell the leaders of Jordan and Saudi Arabia that whatever he did had been done at the behest of the country upon which they depend -the United States.

The role played in all this by President Carter was obviously

As the ninth government, since the 1974 coup, collapsed, the specter of Portugal becoming a second Italy, was raised by a number of commentators. In Rome, governments come and go on a very regular basis indeed and, these commentators asked, what would the social effects be, if Portugal followed this pattern.

No clear predictions have been hazarded and there are important differences between the two coundifferences between the two countries. Portugal has a strong Socialist party holding the middle ground and preventing sharp left-right polarization in the country. Political leaders like Francisco sa Carneiro, major opposition party boss, call for early general elec-tions, a more active presidency and a revised constitution, as solutions to the present predicament.

Sa Caneiro, heading the Social

With the parliament in a stalemate because all the parties are in a minority, the call for early general elections, not due until 1980, is aimed at unblocking the legislature. But the polls and the soundings of the parties themselves don't indicate great enough swings of voter loyalty to give any one party a majority of votes in the house. So what will early elections solve?

Apparently very little, but offi-cials point out, the ballot is the democratic alternative and if all else fails, it will resorted to it.

The other possibilities are constitutionally laid down and predictably involved but turn on intitiatives from the president who selects the prime minister and satisfies himself that the cabinet chosen has a reasonable chance of survival and political stability.

Two of these initiatives have failed since the country's first constitutional government, the 17-month old minority Socialist by Mario administration, beaded Soares, collapsed last December The search for other formulae will go on until elections remain as the inertia over policy-making. Politics in Britain could also regain its es-sential vitality and, even more, its only alternative.

And then the scenario could be

But the Portuguese have one thing in their favor: They frequently come up with intuitive rather than logical solutions, just in time to confound the prophets of gloom

Now, compare this second try of his, this "Midnight Express," to "L'Ordre et la Securite du Monde" or any of the recent screen chases and the vitality and clarity of his treatment become boldly apparent. Seizing upon the autobiography of an American youth who was apprehended for smuggling hashish at the Istanbul airport and sentenced to a term in a gruesome Turkish fortress, he has transformed it into a high-voltage thriller. His is a triumph of metier over matter, for his scenario, with its ugly streaks of racism and its blotches of sen-timentality, is as riddled with holes as a Swiss cheese or the scripts of his rivals. What he has done is to ammate it with enormous excitement, camouflaging its gaping gaps by allowing no time for meditation. He steps on the accelerator to wheeze us through a gripping night-mare of police brutality, jail-house mare of police brutahty, jail-house blues and hairbreadth escapes, illuminating a lurid document with blazing theatrical energy.

Under these high-pressure circumstances — the heat is turned on

Rome Cannot Take Credit for the Apple

If ASKED what is the most common or the most familiar of all with it? Why is apple not known in the north by some form of the Lattroduce the apple to northern Eutruits, most persons would answer the apple, in Europe or North America at least. But what is really known about the apple? Where did it come from? How did it get to where it is found today? If you don't know, there is no need to be abashed. The experts don't know

Two statements are frequently made, and generally accepted, about the apple. One is that it originated in southeastern Europe or southwestern Asia. The other is that it came from the Mediterranean Basin, which is, indeed, the birthplace of many of our most widespread fruits, and was carried throughout Europe by the Romans. I am prepared to argue that both of these statements are incorrect, admittedly on circumstantial evi-dence. But the circumstantial evidence is suppled by the apple itself — by its nature and by its name.

The nature of the apple is such that it is at its best and tastiest in relatively rigorous climates — the Pacific Northwest, New England, old England, the Baltie region (But: "The only ripe fruits we have at home," Heinrich Heine, who was from the Rhineland, not the Baltic, once wrote wistfully from Italy, "are cooked apples.") The tree requires a resting period of about two months, which means that its best climate is one with a distinctly marked winter — hardly characteristic of the Mediterranean area. The optimum habitat of the apple is far north of that sea; it must have been in the north that it developed is growing habits.

The name of the apple is — the apple. That is, it is the apple in English, in German, in Dutch and in the Scandinavian languages, tongues of the climates in which it grows best. If it was the Romans make guest appearances.
"Fedora," somewhat old-fashioned in style, has occasional brilwho brought it to northern Europe, why did they not bring its name some of the credit we have within pomum, as it is in French (pomme)? Or by some form of the Latin mahon, as it is in Italian (mela)? It was because there was no need for a new word in the north, for the north had not been con-fronted with a new object. The Romans did not introduce the apple into northern Europe. It was already there. And it was already called the apple.

The name of the apple may help to unlock the secret of its origin. Among those who attribute the apple to southeastern Europe or southwestern Asia, there are those who locate it more exactly just north of the Caucasus mountains. Very probably it was from there that the apple made its way to the Mediterranean, but it did not start from there. The Caucasus region was only a stop on the way.

There is a word in Old Slavonic for apple, jabhuko, it must have seemed so barbaric in form to the peoples of the Mediterranean that they failed to import it with the fruit, preferring to find for it a name of their own more consonant with their phonetic habits. Jabluko was also a pretty far cry from the word from which it was supposed to have been derived - apel. This was a Crimean word (the Crimea is just south of the Caucasus, though a trifle offsides).

It was, in fact, not simply a Crimean word, but a Crimean Gothic word. There was an enclave of Goths in the Crimea and though they were on alien territory, they had preserved their own vocabulary, recognizably Teutonic. If they had been able to bring elements of their language from the shores of the Baltic (where the elimate is propitious to apples) to the shores of the Black Sea, did they not bring the apple, too? If so, the apple continued on its way, its name stayed behind.

Let us now return to the Romans rope but they did introduce some apples, presumably improved varieties better than their ancestors, to whose territory the descendants were now returning. Those authorities who maintain. convincingly enough, that the apple was native to France, where it is found wild everywhere, admit that was once bitter and far from tempting; it was not sufficiently te-puted to prevent France from adopting the Roman name along with the Roman apples.

Lumped Together

Apples were probably not much more attractive in England, where most experts agree that long before the Romans arrived, at a time when ancient Britons were dressing in animal skins and staining their bodies blue with the juice of the yellow-flowered woad, apples were grow-ing wild in the English forests but they were already so familiar that when the Romans planted new varieties, from which most of today's 300 kinds of English cider apples are descended, the new fruits were lumped together with the old ones under the already es-tablished name of "apple." Similar-ly, along the Balue, "apple embraced the new types with the old.

The Romans had plenty of apples to bestow upon others, though neither the Egyptians, the Hebrews nor the Greeks had done much to develop the fruit.

Pliny and Diodorus both wrote of the Roman fundness for apples, especially those imported from Gaul, where by their time the improved varieties had found a more ropitious climate than that of Ita-Roman farmers, meanwhile, had added many new apples vanished from Italy when agriculture lan-guished after the collapse of the Roman Empire — but the Saracens reintroduced the best of them half a millenium later.

Cold War in the Place de la Madeleine

By Naomi Barry

DARIS, Sept. 19 (IHT) - The I Place de la Madeleine, probably the world's greatest conglom-eration of deluxe grocery stores, is on the eve of cold war.

Long established on the square around the neoclassical Church of the Madeleine are Caviar Kaspia, La Maison de la Truffe, Hediard, will be the Comptoir de Michel Guerard.

In the fancy new sbop, Guerard — the crown prince of la nouvelle cuisine and the promulgator of cuisine minceur - will present mainly the products of sonthwest France, the area where he re-established himself several years ago after clos-ing his celebrated bistro, the Pot au

Feu, on the outskirts of Paris. Featured in the Comptoir will be Cognacs, Armagnacs, fruit brandies, wines, confit of goose, pre-served fruits and vegetables and a few prepared dishes with the Guerard signature.

Edmond Bory, proprietor of Fauchon, has taken umbrage, regarding the location catty-corner to his palace of gastronomy as an unnecessary muscling in on his territory by Guerard's mentors, who had come to him for advice on setting up a retail establishment.

Roger Verge (Moulin de Mougins) will be represented with a garlie purce, small pickled onions, preserved cucumbers. Jean Delaveyne (Restaurant le Camelia at Bougival) is furnishing both his fresh salmon and his salmon smoked with sea salt. Gerard Besson (owner of the new Paris restaurant of the same name on the Rue Coq Heron) is making the fresh duck liver according to the recipe he learned when worked with Georges Garin.

China Invites Cardin Ideas, Papers Report

HONG KONG, Sept. 19 (NYT)

With skirts and dresses reappearing recently on Chinese women for the first time in a decde, China has reportedly invited French designer Pierre Cardin and one of Japan's leading couturieres. Hanae Mori, to Peking to act as consultants on Chinese fashion.

According to reports in Hong Kong's Communist newspapers, Miss Mori will arrive in the Chi nese capital next week, with Cardin to follow later in the fall. Miss Mori, who is best known for her brilliant prints and soft, fluttery feminine dresses, is said to be ready to sign a contract with the Chines to provide new ideas for women's clothing.

The invitations to the two designers suggest a sharp departure in official thinking in Peking about clothes. Since the Cultural Revolntion began in 1965, with dresses and skirts attacked as decadent and bourgeois, Chinese women had somberly attired themselves only in loose shirts and baggy pants. Col-ors usually ran from proletarian dark gray and revolutionary blue to full black.

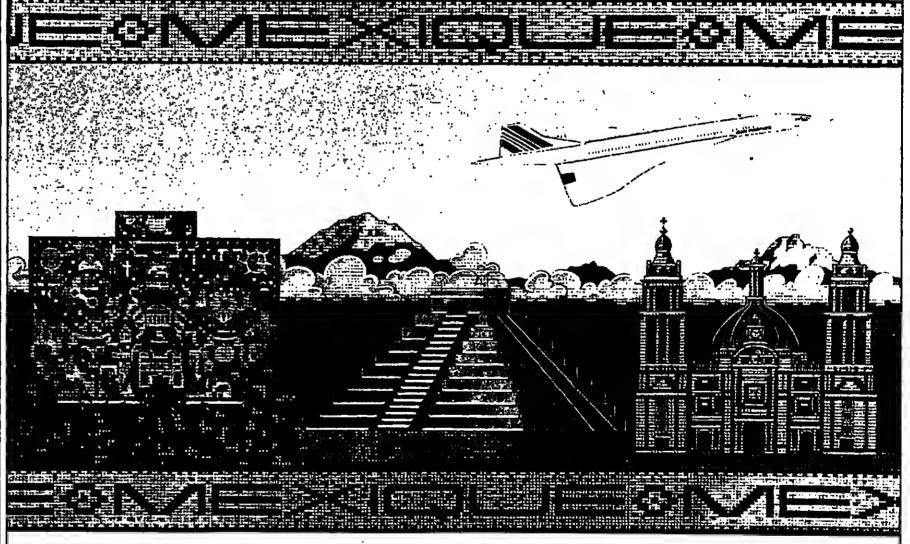

A few Chinese women who daringly defied the ban actually had their skirts ripped off during the Cultural Revolution by zealous Red Guards.

But this summer, foreigners in Peking began to notice the reappearance of Chinese women's

Dollar Eases In Adjusting On 'Snake'

LONDON, Sept. 19 (AP-DJ) -The dollar came under downward pressure in trading today to end mixed, but the overall trend was distorted by a movement of funds within the joint European currency

While the dollar declined against most currencies, there apparently was a net movement of funds out of French francs, guilders and Belgian francs and into Deutsche marks in the belief that any agree-ment on an enlarged currency snake under the new European Monetary System would involve a revaluation of the mark against the weaker Common Market curren-

Thus, the French franc weakened against the dollar for the second day, with the dollar ending at 4.3975 French francs, up from 4.3838 Monday but it was unchanged against the mark at 1.9745

Although the dollar fell marginally against the Benelux currencies, the dollar's decline probably reflected dollar sales by central banks to force their currencies higher to within the required range of the Deutsche mark's peg within the snake. Nevertheless, the Benelux currencies finished trading at or near the bottom support points against the mark.

The dollar weakened to 1.5695 Swiss francs, down from 1.5795 francs yesterday and within striking distance of the record intraday trading low of 1.5485 francs on Aug. 15. The dollar also weakened to 190.13 yen from 190.70 while sterling rose to $1.9620 from $1.9590. Gold closed at $213.25-.75, up from $210.90-211.40, buying-selling, yesterday.

The warning came in the form of a letter to U.S. chief trade negotia-tor Robert Strauss from Wilhelm Haferkamp, the EEC commissioner for external affairs, a commission

The letter today won full approval from EEC foreign ministers. They discussed among other subjects the state of the MTN held in Geneva under the auspices of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade the explorement said.

Trade, the spokesman said. Under the 1974 U.S. Trade Act, the administration has the right to waive countervailing action, usually penalty duties, against certain EEC exports, up to Jan.3, 1979, commission officials explained.

lti an informal communication to the commission, Mr. Strauss is understood to have noted that Washington would have difficulties in winning congressional approval for an extension of the waiver, especially in view of Congress facing elections in November, officials

In his reply to Mr. Strauss, Mr. Haferkamp pointed ont that the community may find it impossible to conclude the MTN talks on Dec.15 as is tentatively scheduled, unless the waiver is extended, the commissioo spokesman said.

Commission officials explained that if the EEC would conclude the MTN, aimed at reducing tariffs and tariff-like barriers in December, it would take some time — probably 8 to 10 months — before the United States can ratify the trade accord.

If the waiver were not extended, in the commission officials say, then the United States would have to counterval some EEC products, es-pecially in the agricultural sectors

Higher Energy Costs Seen Shifting Growth Trends

By John M. Lee

NEW YORK, Sept. 19 (NYT) — The economy does not work like it used to. This is a familiar excuse from government policymakers who have just scrapped their latest unsuccessful initiative. But such complaints do contain grains of truth. There have indeed been puzzling developments as business activity continues to recover from the depths of the recession in the spring of 1975.

One surprise has been the exceptionally rapid increase in U.S. employment (and the unexpectedly sharp drop in unemployment) compared with other business recoveries in the postwar period. Economists were startled par-ticularly by the creation of one million oew jobs in the United States in the first quarter of this year, at a time when economic output actually pickup in capital investment relative to previ-ous business expansions. The annual rate of spending for plant and equipment still trails the rate at the end of the last boom in November 1973, after allowing for inflation.

Econometric Study There have been various attempted explanations, ranging from statisti-cal aberrations to the effects of heavier government regulation. One of the theories concerns the impact of higher energy costs, and this seems to be borne out in an econometric study released this month by Data Resources Inc.

The analysis was prepared by Edward Hud-son and Dale Jorgenson of the Lexington, Mass., economic research organization. Their findings were published in Data Resources' Review of the U.S. for September.

What the authors have done is compare 1972.

the last year of low energy prices before the 1973-74 oil-price increase, with 1976, the last year for which complete price statistics are available. Using a complicated series of mathematical equations that make up a "model" of the economy, they have computed what would have happened in 1976 bad low energy prices

Explains Job Gains, Lag in Productivity

Their overall conclusion is that higher energy prices have had "a dramatic effect" on the economy, "imposing a significant and continu-

"The impact is not limited to a reduction in the growth of energy consumption," the au-thors say, "but has resulted in a slowdown in economic growth, a weak recovery in capital spending, a substantial increase in employment and a decline in the growth of productivity."

Energy Use Reduction

Specifically, real gross national product in 1976 (after adjusting for inflation) was reduced by 3.2 percent, and total energy consumption was reduced by 8.8 percent. At first glance, this implied deep in the percent sizable drop in the use of higher-priced energy might suggest improved efficiency since each dollar of gross national product requires less energy input. But this would be misleading. "This reduction in energy use is not costless," Data Resources says.

To make up for the reduction in energy, pro-ducers must increase their use of labor, capital, materials and the like. Input patterns are shifted away from energy, but there is no net reduction in input levels.

Productivity Loss

This means that the decline in employment resulting from slower business activity is offset to some extent by increased demand for labor to supplant the reduced consumption of energy. The largest increases in the use of labor have occurred in services and in manufacturing. Thus, in 1976, despite the reduction in economic growth, employment declined by only half a millioo jobs as a result of higher energy prices.

This is, of course, a mixed blessing. It is good news to jobbolders and politicians, but it is a disturbing development to those worned about ecocomic efficiency. The additional labor required per unit of output means a loss in productivity.

The Data Resources researchers calculated that the economic restructuring following the higher energy prices led to a 2.57 percent decline in labor productivity, about twice the antiual rate of productivity increase between 1950 and 1970. In effect, two years of productivity increase was lost.

Inflation then enters the picture. To the extent that real wage increases exceed the lower productivity growth, unit labor costs are in-creased and inflation is exacerbated. The good oews is that these are one-time effects following on the price jolts of 1973-74 rather than recurring changes.

Permanent Loser

But the economy is a permanent loser in that certain elements of dynamism are lost forever, and growth must proceed from a lower base. If additional, adverse economie factors come into play, such as slower expansion of productive capacity, then the business community suffers a

The sharp fall in productivity this year to something less than 1 percent has followed n large upsurge in employment at a time of slower growth. Higher energy costs have thus made their contribution.

So it is with capital investment. The demand for capital services declines as the overall level of economic activity declines, but the drop in capital demand by manufacturing and trans-makes perfectly good sense to begin turning their increasingly valuable fuel resources into products such as ethylene and propylene, the two major building-block chemicals that can be sold on the world market for nearly four times as much as a barrel of crude oil.

Beginning to Hurt

Already the flow of chemicals from oew plants is beginning to hurt the established European pro-ducers. For the United States, the general pessimistic expectation is that chemical exports, which amounted to $5.2 billion last year, will suffer badly in the years ahead.

$12 billion. Of this, $3 billion is being spent in the Mideast, By some estimates, spending on new petrochemical plants over the next decade could reach $90 billion.

The petrochemical industry has long been dominated by chemical and oil companies in Europe and the United States, but the stage is being set for a global shakeout that ultimately will direct the industry's center toward the big oil and gas "prodocing nations."

Nor is the coming petrochemical competition restricted to the oilproducing nations. Countries such as Brazil, Argentina, Spain and Greece, without any significant oil production of their own, are planning their own petrochmical industries, to be run with imported oil.

oil concerns in the United States and Europe that are parties to this worldwide competitive expansion. Many are involved in joint ventures, providing governments with technology and know-how to devel-op petrochemical industries. Overcapacity in the petrochemical industry is hardly new. The industry bas always had to live through boom-and-bust cycles. Indeed, the present global glut is largely due to a recent over-build-ing of chemical plants in the Unit-ed States and Europe. This fol-lowed the 1974 surge in demand for petrochemicals that was spurred on a fear of shortages as a result of the oil crisis.

But the present falloff in chemical sales in Europe is more than just cyclical. For the first time the European Economie Community, which is home to nine of the world's 14 largest chemical companies, is feeling competitioo from producers in the Soviet-bloc

ers themselves are partly responsi-ble for this. They built the Eastern-bloc plants not for eash but under "buyback" arrangements by which they take part of the plants' annual production. These agreements were signed during a period of heavy demand, but now, as Europe emerges from the mid-1975 recession, demand has slackened. Thus, the buybacks from Eastern Europe, which under the agreements cannot be exported by the companies, are depressing prices.

The Eastern inflow amounts to only a trickle at present, but it will pick up sharply next year and reach a floodtide in the early 1980s, a time when it is expected the European petrochemical industry will be operating at only 60 percent to 70 percent of capacity. Also during the 1980s, huge plants in the Mideast and Spain.

Portugal, Greece and Turkey will go into operatioo and will begin shipping petrochemical products to Western Europe. To deal with this growing competition, the EEC countries are considering forming what has been called a "crisis cartel" of all European chemical producers. This would control the production and marketing of synthetic textile fibers. An area of the industry where outside competition is particularly acute.

OVERCOMING MATH ANXIETY

By Sheila Tobias. Norton. Illustrated. 278 pp. $10.95,

BIRTH and death are scary, to where she has apparently had unusbe sure. But for those who sual success working with "mathhave experienced what Sheila Tobias calls "Math Anxiety," they seem like nothing compared with the sense of shame and guilt and humiliation that comes over you when the numbers and symbols don't make sense and everyone else around you is ciphering busily sway. That's why I grabbed Sheila Tobias' "Overcoming Math Anxiety" as eagerly as I bought my first pocket calculator. Also, it's a subject I happen to have thought about a lot — so much so that long ago I arrived at the conclusion that any human being who has mastered the complexities of language ought to be able to do a relatively simple thing like mathematics. This is reassuring if you think there is reassuring if you think there is something congenitally wrong with you because you cannot do math. But it doesn't offer much in the way of practical help.

Sheila Tobias, on the other hand, offers practical help. Herself a sometime victim of a number of neuroses, she first beichtens our neuroses, she first heightens our anxiety by reminding us that be-cause of "ever-increasing depend-ence on technology and the everincreasing democratization of jobs," math has come to matter more in contemporary life than ever before. But then she turns to the causes of math anxiety and attempts to expose them trunk and

She assures us that while there may be such a thing as mathematical genius, there is no such thing as inherent mathematical nincompoopery. Some people think they are inept, she argues, because they are confused by the ambiguities of mathematical language. (Children raised on the Biblical notion that to "multiply" means to "increase," have trouble grasping the idea that when you multiply fractions you end up with less.) Or their minds work differently from the way their teachers' do, and they are afraid of exposing this seeming eccentricity by asking questions. Or they may be female, and thus have absorbed the publications of the context of the subliminal message conveyed in so many classrooms that females are inferior because, among other failings, they can't do math. (There are still textbooks extant, Tobias points out, where the girls used as models in word problems are actually paid less for certain jobs than the boys are for the same work in similar problems.)

Whatever the source of anxiety may be, there is hope and there are some positive steps one can take, such as joining a math-anxiety workshop (there is a list of available programs in the book's appendix) and retracing the steps through one's original trauma by means of open discussion and diary-keeping. Sheila Tobias is all encouraging cheeriness, even in her lucid descriptive chapter on calculus, and I would guess that if you wanted to start from scratch — as a number of people I know are doing, if only to shore up their self-esteem - you could do worse than to begin right here with "Overcoming Math Auxiety." It's never too late, ac-cording to the best advice that the author has been able to gather; even mathematical intuition can be cultivated with practice, provided you track down the source of your original trouble.

My only serious quibble is whether or not the author's perceptions are deep enough to get at all the sources of people's troubles. Sheila Tobias is a founding member of the National Organization of Women and the designer of a math clinie at Wesleyan University, sual success working with "math-anxious" adults. But I wonder if the feminist slant of her book with occasional grace notes thrown in for men - sufficiently accounts for how much the masculine image of math can intimidate men as well as women. In a way, it can be even worse for boys to have trouble at the early stages of math than it is for girls, for boys lack the comfort of conforming to stereotype, how-ever false and damaging that stereotype may be.

And what about the tendency of many people to have trouble he-cause they perceive numbers in re-verse order from the way they are actually written? Does dyslexia— or at least that aspect of it that manifests itself in symbol reversal - lead to problems with math as well as to reading disability? I sup-pose if one did have this sort of problem, one would learn about it in the normal course of the various therapies the author advocates. Still, despite an otherwise solid chapter on brain physiology, she never mentions what neurologist sometimes designate "minimal brain dysfunction."

Finally, a quibble concerning the production of the book; at a minimal when proof-reading is quibble by when proof-reading is quickly be-coming a lost art, this book sets some sort of record for mislabeled diagrams, botched footnote design nations, and misprints in general; I realize that this is the publisher's. responsibility and ought not to take up space devoted to the author's contribution. Nevertheless, this book's essential message is that even people who are disinclined to do so can solve problems requiring accurate thinking and correct answers. The profusion of printing errors in "Overcoming Math Anxi-ety" only serves to undermine that

Baltimore struck for three touchdowns earlier in the fourth quarter — which was played in heavy rain - as Washington passed 54 yards to wide receiver Roger Carr on a halfback option play and took a 23yard pass from quarterback Bill Troup, who was substituting for the injured Bert Jones. Troup appar-ently iced the game with a 67-yard scoring pass to Carr with 8:19 left for a 27-13 lead.

Bot the Patriots, 1-2, came back with a 4-yard touchdown run by quarterback Steve Grogan with 3:22 left in the game.

Carr had 187 yards on six recepnons, including his two long touchdown receptions in the fourth quarter as Baltimore came back from a 13-7 halftime deficit.

The Colts capitalized in the fourth quarter on New England turnovers as Blackwood recovered Johnson's fumble before Washington's halfback option pass to Carr and linebacker Ed Simonini set up the 67-yard score from Troup to Carr with a diving interception.

After the game, Washington was in a confident mood. "We're like a boat crossing the Atlantic," he said of the Colts. "We've hit some bad storms, but oow it's clear sailing."

Vikings Protest

BLOOMINGTON, Minn., Sept. 19 (AP) — Bud Grant, the Minnesota Viking coach, says a close inspection of game films shows that Kevin Miller did not touch the ball when officials ruled that he fumbled a punt Sunday against Tampa Bay.
The ball was recovered by Tampa Bay on the Vikings' 5-yard line and led to the winning touchdown in the Bucs' 16-10 National Fontball League upset.

"We have no evidence in our film that he ever touched the ball," said Grant "The ball went over Kevin's right shoulder, cleared his head by two feet. And if Kevin had touched it, he would have made every effort

Miller, a rookie, tried to catch the punt in the air but let it roll past him when he could oot field it.
"I didn't touch it." he said.

History, too, is in the making in Copenhagen. The Danes have as-sembled 12 of their mercenaries, from leading clubs scattered around the continent, who, as the first paid Danish international squad, will try to beat England for the first time. They include Allan Simonsen, the European player of the year, from Moenchengladbach, goalkeeper Berger Jensen from Bruges, left back Soren Lerby from Ajax, midfielder Carstein Nielsen from Moencheogladbach and striker Benny Nielsen from RWD

Carlsberg is pumping hundreds of thousands of dollars into professionalizing Danish soccer, and these nomads will collect a cool £ 700 a man if they beat England. If the game was only about skilled forwards who can turn a goal in an instant, Denmark would be confident: Alas, defense comes into it as well and the Danes, who scrambled a 3-3 draw at home to the Republic of Ireland earlier this year, are none ton sophisticated at the back. Even so, England is a little ocryous about this one. Manager Ron Greenwood has recorded his admiration for the Danish individuals the team reads like a Who's Who of continental soccer - be has agreed that this is the first truly competitive test of the side he began building last year and he acknowledges the contest will be stiff. There is still resentment among the players that the boss refused to share in their blame for what went wrong in Argentina, and Austria is about as challenging as Scotland could wish. So there's oo way to shrug off Sadaharu Oh and his 800 home runs, wherever they were hit. For 15 seasons, he was the home-run leader of the Central League of Japan, 13 of them in a row. Decline of the Uncle

By Russell Baker

NEW YORK — Among my uncles was one who could reconception? Does life end when the member being born. I have heard him describe the hlessed event, including the expression of rapture on his father's face. This same uncle later fought with the Marines in France during the First World War and was shot right between the eyes by a German soldier, which made my uncle so angry that he immediately drew his own pistol and dispatched the German to kingdom come.

In the family, this uncle was famous for being an

Baker entertaining liar, and I never believed him for an instant, even when I was only 6 or 7 years old, but I remember him affectionately still, perhaps because his fictions trained me in the art of recognizing hilge, which later helped me survive so many politi-

Most children don't seem to have uncles like this anymore. Most children don't seem to have uncles at all. Many are lucky if they have a father and a mother under the same roof. The American family be-comes smaller and smaller. If I were doing a sociological thumb-sucker on the subject, I would title it "The Incredible Shrinking Family.

This is by way of backing into the so-called right-to-life issue. It isn't a right to life that the antiabortion lohby is concerned with so much as a right to birth. A right-tolife movement in politics would be an extremely radical fringe in a highly militarized superstate such as ours, because it would have to oppose the state's right to take life for some collective purpose the state considers good.

The right-to-life movement does not oppose war, or even capital punishment, hut only the destruction of fetuses. It wants laws to support a right to be born, just as laws already support the state's right under certain circumstances to kill those who have heen born.

Philosophically, it is a very diffi-cult issue. Its resolution requires an arbitrary definition of life at a time when both science and law are uncertain when life begins and when conception? Does life end when the heart of a mindless body can be sustained only by perpetual ma-chine operation? Tough questions to answer, except by arbitrary redefinition of the words "life" and

The anti-abortion movement, making its case for the ferus, and hence for the family, does not have bright prospects. It is arguing for the obligations of the family at a time when the family is a declining American institution. More and more Americans now look to the government or private husiness to free them from ohligations that used to be the family's.

Parents want government daycare centers for children. Old people want Social Security, insurance and government medical programs to see them into old age. Very old, helpless people who used to be cared for within the family, often with much agony to everyone, now make profits for private nursing

The family was once a miniature society handling these problems, hul in its present shrunken and fragmented state, it is neither able nor willing to take them on. Success for the right-to-life movement would result in more unwanted children, and while it may be better to have lived and been unwanted than never to have lived at all, it is likely, considering the decline of the family, that the unwanted, too, will wind up in large numbers in the care of the government. In this business I am saddened rather than opinionated. Unwanted children are saddening, but so is the decline of the family impulse, which has proceeded simultaneously with the nasty aggrandizement of the state. I speak, admittedly, from personal hias, having had the childhood enrichment of 21 or 22

My uncle who remembered being horn is dead now. If he were alive, he would probably remember being conceived. I am thankful they all were, although admittedly their multitude was bad for the ecology.

A new book puts the traditional speech patterns of the English literally on the map.

When an Englishman Has a Skullache

By Roy Reed

ONDON (NYT) — If an Englishman says that he has a skullache, he is describing more about himself than a pain in his head. He is also announcing. perhaps unwittingly, that he is from East Anglia.

And if the same man adds that he is going home to mash a pol of tea, he is pinning down his origins even further — western Norfolk, somewhere around the village of Grimston.

But a mere 16 miles away, at Great Snoring, they would make fun of that kind of talk. People there have headaches, not skullaches. Furthermore, they don't mash their tea at Great Snoring; they draw it.

A book published here by Croom Helm Ltd. puts the traditional speech patterns of the English people literally on the map. Called "The Linguistic At-las of England," it shows how the older people use words in every corner of this stunningly diverse little country.

A Goldmine

The book, which is scholarly, heavy reading, is expected to be a goldmine for social historians and students of language history. Scholars who have tried to trace the speech patterns of English colonists — New Englanders, for example — have long been stymied by the lack of just such an atlas in the mother

Any gifted amateur can tell where a Englishman is from by his pronunciation. The atlas goes further. It maps vocabulary, syntax and grammar, as well as pronunciation. It also traces the origins of words to Old and Middle English, Norse, French,

The book is the culmination of more than 30 years of work. It was compiled by a group of scholars engaged in the English Dialect Survey, a project begun in 1947 by Prof. Harold Orton. After he died in 1975, the work was finished by scholars at Leeds University.

The atlas stops at the borders of Scotland and Wales. Even without those Celtic contributions, it records astonishing variations in speech.

313 Places

The field workers interviewed older people in 313 places, mainly farming villages with stable populations. They interviewed city people in four places: Leeds, York, Sheffield and the London borough of Hackney. For the interviews, Orton and another language scholar. Eugen Dieth, devised a questionnaire with more than 1,300 questions. For example, the interviewers asked each person what he or she called a pea-pod, as taught hy their forebears. They got eight different answers across the country, from "hull" on the Scottish border to "shuck" on the south coast.

The word for lavatory is also different in every region. In Nor-folk it is "petty" (apparently from the French petit) hut just to the south in Suffolk it is "privy." The northerners call it the "nessy," from "necessary."

The field survey was carried out between 1950 and 1961. Orton surmised that the 1950s offered the last chance to study the old rural speech patterns. The English shifted their residences considerably during World War II. The mobility continued after the war and was accentuated by television and the growth of other forms of communication.

The atlas includes four sets of maps - 473 in all - recording vocabulary, pronunciation, grammar and syntax.

Using Genetic Characteristics to Pinpoint Paternity

By Jane E. Brody

NEW YORK (NYT) - The genetic characteristics that determine a person's suitability as a donor for an organ to be transplanted to someone else are being used with remarkable accuracy to pinpoint a child's true father in cases of disputed paternity.
